How child support affects your Family Tax Benefit

If you get Family Tax Benefit and you are not in a relationship with the other parent of your child, you might need to apply for child support.

What is child support

Child support is money a parent pays to the other parent to help with the costs of looking after their child.

Both parents are responsible for the costs of bringing up a child even if they are not in a relationship or one of the parents lives overseas.

When you apply for child support, we will tell you and the other parent who needs to pay child support and how much to pay.

Services Australia can also collect this money for you.

How child support can affect your Family Tax Benefit

Child support payments and Family Tax Benefit Part A are linked.

The amount of child support you get can affect your Family Tax Benefit Part A.

If you have a child from a previous relationship and get Family Tax Benefit, you have a set time to apply for child support.

After this time, if you have not applied for child support or contacted us to talk about your options, you may get less Family Tax Benefit until you apply.

If there are reasons you cannot apply for child support, you need to let us know.

How to apply for child support

To apply for child support, you will need to call our Services Australia Child Support staff on 131 272.

To accept your application, we need to check who the birth parents of the child are. We may ask you to answer some questions or give us some paperwork. We usually need to talk to the other parent too.

If you cannot apply for child support

You can let us know if there are reasons you cannot apply for child support from the other parent of your child. These can be:

- cultural reasons
- family and domestic violence
- if claiming child support makes you feel unsafe
- other reasons that are sensitive.

You will need to talk to one of our social workers and tell them why you cannot apply for child support.

We can then give you an exemption, so you do not need to ask for child support from the other parent.

For more information

- Call 131 202 to speak with us in your language about Family Tax Benefit and if you cannot apply for child support.
- Visit your local Services Australia service centre.
